This past summer I researched the topic of sustainability and planned assignments that will be introduced into three existing photography courses at Francis Marion University. I will incorporate a sustainability theme into three existing introductory photography courses: Introductory Photography (ART 208), Introduction to Digital Photography (Art 218), and Photojournalism (MCOM 304). One assignment will direct students to photograph examples of sustainable and/or non-sustainable development, such as residential developments that practice “smart growth.” Another assignment will focus on examples of sustainable or nonsustainable activities on the Francis Marion University campus. For example, campus recycling efforts could be documented. I’ve also planned a student-created web page with photographs from class assignments illustrating sustainability themes. Also, I spoke with colleagues from other disciplines who will visit my classes to discuss sustainability concepts.
