“Six months before the election of President Donald Trump, Mark Blyth predicted the result. He did so by placing Trump’s election in global context that tracked the evolution of the global growth regime over the prior 30 years. But since Trump’s election many of the factors that supposedly drove his election have diminished in importance. In Europe in particular the rise of “Global Trumpism” seems to have been halted. But is that really the case? Blyth gives a stress test to his theory one year on and argues that the Era of Global Trumpism is far from over.”
